DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The ruins of Rich Neck Cove are located in a pasture on the west side of Bay Head Rd., approximately a mile north of Rt. 50/301.

Two sections of the frame 18th century telescope house are still standing. The building faced south with the largest-two story, three bay section-on the west. According to a c. 1935 photograph of the south elevation, taken before the west section was dismantled, the house had a gable roof with a large chimney inside the west gable. The windows contained 9/6 light, double-hung sash. It had a side hall and parlor on the first floor with a single, large chamber above. The middle section of the house, built with post and beam construction, is believed to predate the larger section. It has a very steep gable roof, covered with wooden shingles, a large brick chimney on the east end and gabled dormers making it a story and a half in height. The windows held 6/6 light sash. The interior consisted of one large room on the first floor with a large fireplace on the east end and a staircase leading to the upper chamber. The small one story, two bay section standing at the west end was the kitchen with a loft above it. The windows contained 6/6 light sash.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Standing in ruins today, in the middle of a cow pasture, are two sections of a frame 18th century telescope house known as Rich Neck Cove. The land on which the ruins stand was originally part of the "Homewood Lott", a 2,000 acre plantation, the largest in Broadneck. C. 1760, the property was owned by Mary and John Hesselius, a portrait painter of Swedish descent as part of their estate "Bellefield".
